Anthem II: Equality Diminished

👁 18 ✓ 0 ★ 1

Chapter 1 by Robledo Thompson Taren

To start off, this is a continuation of Ayn Rands story: Anthem. In that story, our character Equality 7-2521 (Now self named Prometheus) and his Girlfriend Liberty 5-3000 (Now named Gaea) have escaped the city.

The city was a place where everyone was equal and obedient to the elders. They all had the same wake and sleep schedule. The only part that was different was their jobs.

Prometheus was a street sweeper. He felt like he could be more. He found a pothole, he didn't tell the elders though, and neither did his friends. They climbed in and explored. They found how to make light without fire, how to make a dead frog move again, and more.

Eventually he lost track of time one day and got in trouble. The elders whipped him and put him in jail. There were no guards and the locks were weak because everyone was trusted to not escape. He escaped and brought his findings to the World Council of Scholars. They were horrified. He ran into the Uncharted Forest and kept running until it was night. No one has ever survived in the uncharted forest. A few days later he realizes that his crush followed him. They kept walking until they found a house made mostly of glass. They lived there. Gaea was pregnant and Prometheus has vowed to return and save his friends.

We must remember though that this is a work of fiction and books in the house. The rest of the city said "We must remember that this is a work of fiction and books in the house. This story is written in a diary format and in first person."
